"COUNTY FAIR NEXT WEEK" read the sign.

"Oh, boy!" exclaimed Sammy Squirrel to his friend, Wuff the Prairie Dog. "Remember the food they had last year — pies and cakes and jam and everything? And all the nice ladies who let us sample what they had made? My mouth waters every time I think of it."

"We ate so much we could hardly walk," nodded Wuff happily.

As the two friends skipped off to play, their old enemy, Charlie Coyote, slipped out from behind a rock where he had been listening.

"Hmmm," he muttered slyly. "That gives me an idea. I'll have those two delectable morsels in my power without even having to run after them!"

And he crept off to his cave where he quickly began to dig into an old trunk.

"Ha! Here it is!" he chortled. "Grandmother Coyote's recipe for cherry tarts. Very tasty, as I recall, and Wuff and Sammy will get their fill; I'll see to that! They'll be so stuffed, they'll sleep for hours! And while they're napping, I'll nab them!"

When the County Fair opened, Charlie, disguised in his grandmother's old clothes, had no trouble at all entering the delicious tarts in the baking contest.

Sammy Squirrel spied them first, as he and Wuff wandered about the Fair. When they stopped to admire the fine-looking tarts, Charlie said, very sweetly, "Take all you want, boys! I love to see hungry little fellows enjoying themselves!"

Wuff and Sammy started to eat, so delighted with the delicious tarts that they did not even notice Charlie's evil eyes glittering through the disguise.

In fact, since they had been tasting goodies all afternoon, they began to get very full and sleepy.

Charlie's sweet smile was turning into a big grin as he watched them falling into his trap.

Just then, however, the three County Fair judges appeared at the booth.

"Congratulations, madam!" they said to Charlie. "Your tarts have won Second Prize. You must come right over to the judges' stand to receive your award."

While Wuff and Sammy curled up comfortably to finish their tarts, Charlie was led off to the ceremonies.

The awards seemed to last forever, and, as soon as he could get away, Charlie rushed back to the booth. There was no sign of Sammy or Wuff. He dashed from booth to booth looking for them, but the two little friends were nowhere to be seen. Finally, he made his way home, furious and frustrated.

Meanwhile, Sammy Squirrel and Wuff the Prairie Dog were awaking from their naps, full and happy.

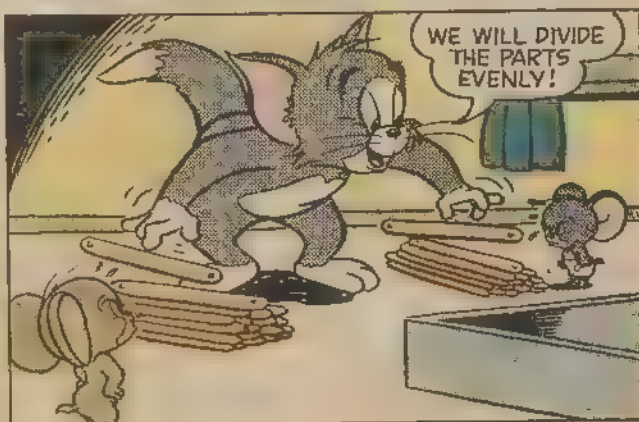

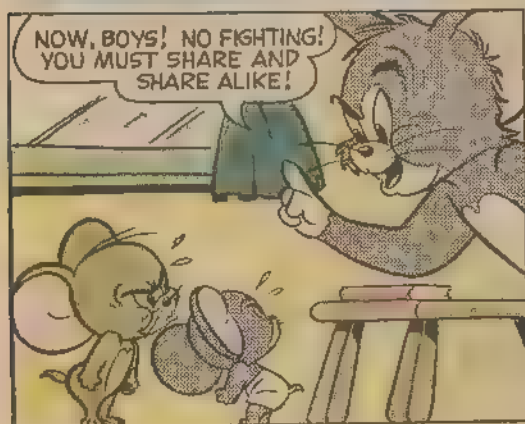

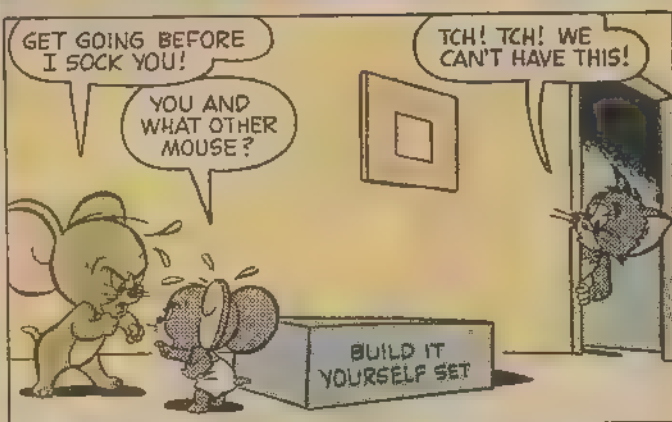

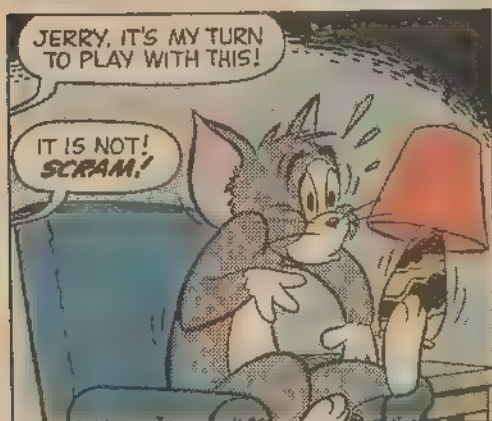

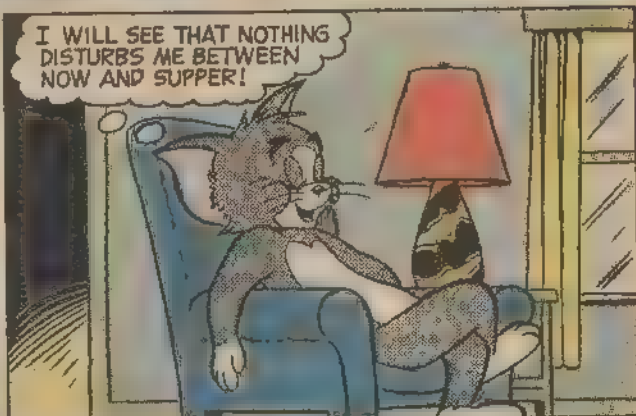

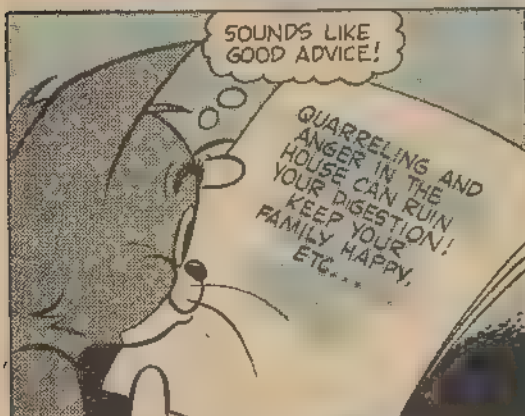

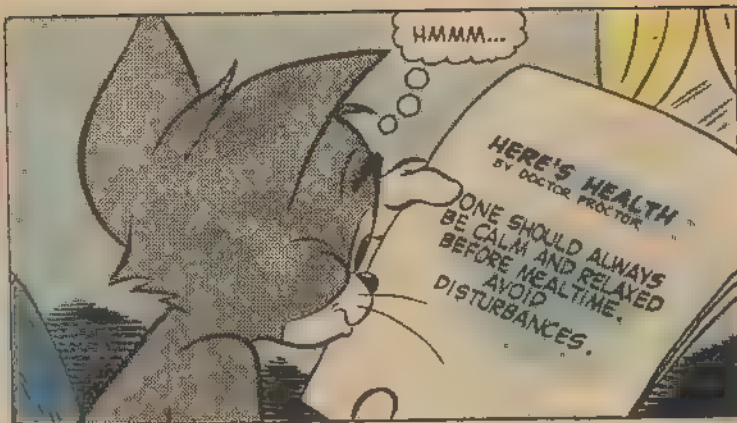

"I hope that nice old lady who made the cherry tarts didn't mind our sleeping under the table in her booth," yawned Sammy contentedly.

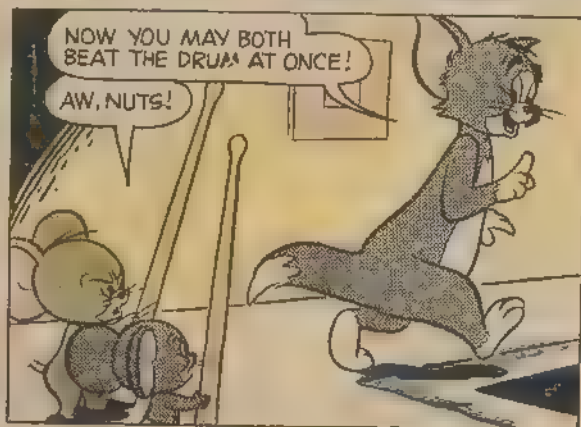

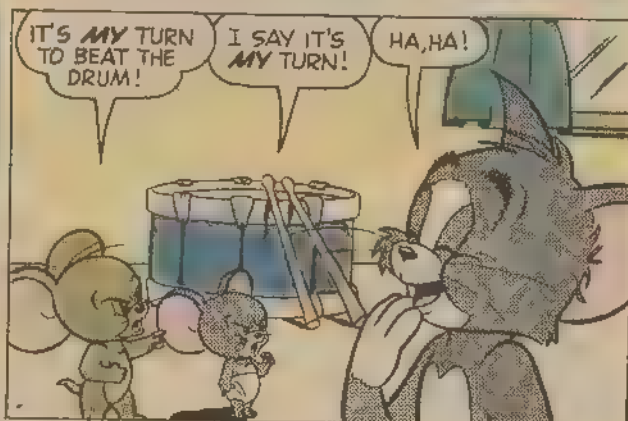

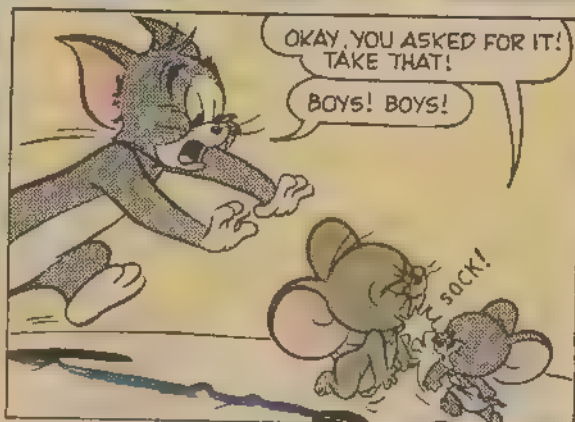

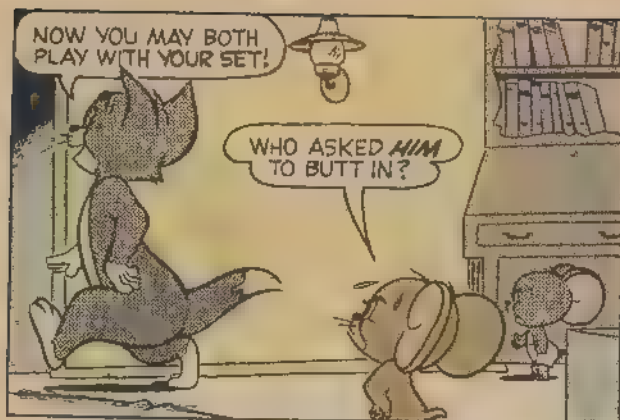

"Don't see her anywhere around to thank her," Wuff sighed. "Oh, well, let's go home, Sammy. I couldn't eat another tart, anyway!"
